STRANGER IN TOWN

UNTIL the city stranger arrived, the citizens of the North Pole had had the whole area all to themselves. The seals, the penguins, the walruses, the polar bears—they had never been anywhere else except the North Pole. They were used to seeing snow everywhere, and icebergs, and Eskimo igloos.

But then the city stranger had come. "Humph," he'd sneered, "what a hick town."

"Hick?" Wally Walrus asked him. "What does that mean?"

"It means somebody who's never been anywhere or done anything," the city stranger answered. "You're all a bunch of hicks."

"Is that so!" Wally sneered back. "And what's the word for you? City slicker?"

"I," replied the stranger snobbishly, "am a sophisticated gentleman of the cosmopolitan world."

Just then Paul Penguin came waddling by. "Hi Wally," he said to the walrus. Then he stared at the stranger.

The stranger glanced back at him. "Ah, a waiter," said the stranger. "Bring me a fruit salad and a glass of punch, please."

"What?" said Paul Penguin. "Huh?"

The stranger repeated his order. But when Paul just stared at him instead of moving, the stranger got angry. "You are a very poor waiter. I bet you were fired from wherever you used to work."

Paul Penguin beckoned Wally Walrus to meet him behind an igloo. There Paul whispered, "What's he mean? What's a waiter?"

"You're a waiter," smiled Wally. "And I'm a hick!"

"Yeah, but what is a waiter?"

"Well, I dunno, but whatever it is you must look like it!"

Just then Steven Seal came up to them. "What's up?"

The walrus and the penguin told him about the stranger. And when Pete Polar Bear came along they told him about the stranger, too. The four of them put their heads together. How could they teach the city snob a lesson? After a little while Steven Seal had a funny idea. They planned what to do.

When they marched out from behind the igloo towards the stranger, he said, "I'm freezing. You've got this place's air-conditioning turned on too cold."

The North Pole citizens didn't know what on earth he was talking about, so they walked past him. Then he said to Paul Penguin, "Ah, now I see why you got fired from your last job as a waiter. You waddle. A waiter who waddles would spill all the drinks on his tray."

"What makes you think," Paul asked him, "that I am a waiter?"

"Why my good man, it's quite obvious from your clothing," the city stranger replied. "Your white shirt, your black suit, etcetera, etcetera."

"Well," replied the penguin, "I don't know what an etcetera is, but this white and black of mine is feathers."

But the stranger wasn't listening. He was too busy mumbling to himself, "A hick town. Bunch of hicks. Hicks, all of them." And he sneered and sneered and sneered.

Pete Polar Bear winked at Steven Seal. This was the signal to put their plan into action. The four of them marched nearby to a big flat iceberg. Wally Walrus had to stretch himself out between the berg and the mainland so that Paul Penguin and Pete Polar Bear could walk across him like a bridge above the icy sea. The stranger watched with curiosity as the four North Pole citizens sat down in a circle on the iceberg. They pretended to be busy sipping at something.

Finally the stranger called out, "What are you hicks doing?"

The 'hicks' answered, "We're having our mid-afternoon tea party."

"Well, well, well," the stranger said. "A tea party, eh? Maybe this isn't such a hick town after all. May I join you?"

This was just exactly what the four animals had been waiting for. Their idea had worked. A city-ish thing like a tea party was just the type of thing the city slicker would want to be in on. "Sure," they said, "come on over."

Wally Walrus slid down into the water to make a bridge of himself. The stranger stepped onto him, but immediately Wally swam away from the iceberg. The stranger, marooned on a walrus in the middle of an icy sea, screamed, "Help! I'm being kidnapped! Help!"

The others back on the iceberg yelled back at him, "He will bring you back as soon as you stop calling us hicks, and stop calling our beautiful North Pole a hick town."

The stranger agreed, and Paul Penguin called, "And stop calling me a waiter. The only kind of waiter I am is a waiter who's waiting to see a city snob learn his lesson!"

The stranger learned his lesson well. He even settled down at the North Pole, and became a HICK himself!
